

Australian Journal of E February 2006 – 20

To cast a look across the contents pages of the 79 issues of this publication over the past 20 years, anyone would be forgiven for imagining that Australia is not just very active but is the hub of global emergency management action. Such is the depth and breadth of subject matter and topics that have been brought forward for discussion. Alas we are down-under to most of the world and only a small player on a huge stage.

The Australian Journal of Emergency Management was first published as a six page newsletter in March 1986, with the name of The Macedon Digest, to fill an identified “information void within the counter-disaster community.” It was recognised that a need existed for a publication to provide summaries of activities, research and meetings to “operatives, planners, trainers and researchers in the counter disaster/civil defence field.” According to this first issue, “the success of the Digest will depend to a large extent on reader reaction; contributions and comments on content will be welcomed, and will help the Digest to evolve into a useful periodical for all who are involved in the humanitarian field of disaster management.” These sentiments still hold true and continue to have relevance 20 years on.

In September 1988 a sub-title was added – The Australian Newsletter of Disaster Management – and the journal doubled in size. Due to continued support from EMA and the industry, the journal had developed into a substantial black and white publication by 1994, the year of the first special issue, Environmental Health and Disasters. Also in that year a survey of subscribers was undertaken with the findings indicating the journal was considered a valuable source of information that reached a significant proportion of emergency management personnel. A survey of readership conducted in 2004 indicated that the journal continued to maintain its high reputation as a comprehensive, multi-disciplinary publication, regarded by its readership as a reliable and credible source of information covering the full spectrum of emergency management.

By 1995 the title had changed to The Australian Journal of Emergency Management and a special issue focused on ways that the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction had an impact on Australia and the Pacific. By 1997 AJEM, as it had come to be known, had undergone a change in appearance with a full colour back and front cover, which by 1999 had developed to full colour throughout.

International as well as Australian disasters have always received attention in AJEM which has published information on such incidents as the Port Arthur shootings, ice storms in Canada, floods in Katherine, Northern Territory, the tsunami disaster in Papua New Guinea, the Thredbo landslide, and the Auckland electricity supply disruption. More recent coverage includes the Indian Ocean tsunami, bombings in Bali, and Hurricane Katrina, which appears in this issue.

Emergency Management 20th anniversary issue

A change in editor and editorial advisory team in 2002 resulted in a new look and direction for AJEM. Over the last three years the journal's profile has been enhanced through its inclusion on the Commonwealth Department of Education, Science and Training Register of Refereed Journals. AJEM is indexed by the National Library of Australia's Australian Public Affairs Information Service (APAIS) and has recently been accepted for selective indexing by the Attorney-General's Information Service (AGIS). Access to AJEM articles is made available through the Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology Informit service.

In 2004 there were two special issues of AJEM developed through partnership arrangements. In August, in conjunction with the Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, an issue dedicated to the role of government and industry in agricultural emergencies was published. This was followed in November 2004 with a special edition featuring articles from the New Zealand Recovery Symposium, conducted in July of that year. Special issues dedicated to contemporary themes continue to have a role in the emergency management industry. A recent example was the May 2005 issue on counter-terrorism and emergency management.

We have seen some highly esteemed emergency sector participants both as content contributors and as members of the editorial advisory committee. Rather than name any, EMA wishes to record sincere thanks to every one of them for their professionalism and their genuine concern that this country has a robust, forthright and independent forum for expression of views on ways to ensure future generations can enjoy living in 'safer sustainable communities'.

While AJEM has come a long way in the past 20 years, its commitment to providing access to information and knowledge for the research community and practitioners of emergency management remains unchanged. EMA is excited by this milestone and proud to continue such a significant publication into the future.
